Empowering Indigenous Peoples

Established in 1997, the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) Indigenous Fellowship is a training programme, which aims to empower indigenous representatives and their communities by strengthening their knowledge of the United Nations and its human rights instruments and mechanisms (such as Treaty Bodies, Special Procedures, Human Rights Council, Universal Periodic Review), in particular those related to indigenous issues.

Trained fellows are better equipped to assist their organizations and communities to promote and protect indigenous rights.

Since its creation, the Programme has trained 244 indigenous men and women representing more than 125 different indigenous peoples from 54 countries all over the world.

Starting with a small group of four indigenous fellows in 1997, the training brought together twenty-three fellows in 2012, in Geneva.

Learning about Programmes and Mechanisms of Interest to Indigenous Peoples

The Programme curriculum includes both theoretical and practical sessions, individual and group assignments, and observations of sessions of human rights bodies such as the Human Rights Council and the Expert Mechanism on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (EMRIP).

In addition, the training program in Geneva includes introductions to the programmes and activities of other UN agencies or specialized organizations such as the ILO, UNESCO, UNICEF and WIPO.

Introductory sessions to the work of Geneva-based human rights NGOs are also included in the curriculum.

One Programme, Four Languages

The Indigenous Fellowship Programme is available in four languages: English (since 1997), Spanish (since 2000), French (since 2002), and Russian (since 2005). The total duration of the training varies from one language component to another ranging from four weeks to three months. The curriculum is also adjusted as per language component and is currently organized as follows:

- English and French: the training only takes place in Geneva and lasts four weeks;
- Spanish: organized in collaboration with the University of Deusto (UD) in Bilbao, Spain, the programme is composed of a two-month course at the UD, followed by four weeks of training at the OHCHR in Geneva;
- Russian: organized in collaboration with the Peoples’ Friendship University of Russia (PFUR) in Moscow, Russian Federation, the programme consists of a one-month course at the PFUR, followed by four weeks of training at the OHCHR in Geneva.

The training in Geneva (June/July) brings together all four language components; sessions are simultaneously interpreted.
