Human Rights Council
Thirty-seventh session
Agenda item 3
Promotion and protection of all human rights, civil, political, economic, social and cultural rights, including the right to development

Report of the Special Rapporteur on the promotion and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms while countering terrorism on his mission to Saudi Arabia
Contents

I. Introduction .......................................................................................................................... 3
II. Terrorist attacks against Saudi Arabia ........................................................................... 3
III. Legal framework ............................................................................................................ 3
    A. International framework .............................................................................................. 3
    B. National framework .................................................................................................. 4
IV. Key human rights concerns .......................................................................................... 5
    A. Definition of terrorism under the counter-terrorism legislation ............................... 5
    B. Use of the counter-terrorism and state security related legislation to stifle dissent .... 6
    C. Unfair trials before the Specialized Criminal Court ............................................... 8
       1. Use of torture, coerced confessions and lack of accountability .......................... 9
       2. Lengthy pre-trial detentions and flawed investigations ..................................... 11
       3. Lack of independence ............................................................................................ 12
       4. Use of the death penalty following manifestly unfair trials .............................. 12
    D. Rehabilitation ........................................................................................................... 14
    E. Counter-terrorism operations in Yemen and Syria .................................................. 14
V. Conclusions and Recommendations ............................................................................. 16
I. Introduction

1. The Special Rapporteur on the promotion and protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms while countering terrorism, Ben Emmerson, conducted an official visit to Saudi Arabia, from 30 April to 4 May 2017, at the invitation of the Government, to assess progress Saudi Arabia achieved in its law, policies and practice in the fight against terrorism, measured against international human rights law and standards.

2. The Special Rapporteur thanks the Government of Saudi Arabia for having extended an invitation to visit the country and he commends the transparency and the courteous, constructive and cooperative way in which the Government initiated and facilitated the visit, as well as his previous working-level visit in November 2016, both of which allowed a frank and open dialogue on most issues of concern. He also thanks the United Nations Office in Saudi Arabia for providing valuable support throughout the visit.

3. The Special Rapporteur thanks the heads of all governmental institutions that he met. He had the opportunity to hold exchanges of views about Government’s efforts in combating terrorism with the Minister of Justice, the President of the Bureau of Investigation and Public Prosecution, the General Director of the General Directorate of Investigation of the Ministry of Interior, the President of the Specialized Criminal Court, the Chairman of the National Society of Human Rights and the President of the Human Rights Commission.

4. The Special Rapporteur also had discussions with Chief of Police Station in Al Manar, and Directors and personnel of Al Hair and Dhahban prisons, as well as at the Mohammed Bin Naif Counselling and Care Centre. The Special Rapporteur’s team conducted interviews with individuals accused and convicted of terrorist crimes and met, although not privately, with representatives of families of victims of terrorist violence.

5. The Special Rapporteur shared his preliminary findings with the Government of Saudi Arabia at the end of his visit, on 4 May 2017.

II. Terrorist attacks against Saudi Arabia

6. The Special Rapporteur was informed by the Government that over the past three decades Saudi Arabia has suffered high numbers of terrorist attacks by Al-Qaida and lately by ISIL and other groups against military and civilian targets. According to official records, there have been altogether 1075 terrorist plots identified in the country since 1987. The Special Rapporteur was informed that 844 of these were effective, many with devastating consequences, and that 231 plots were disrupted. A total of 3178 individuals were killed or injured as victims of terrorism over this period. The Special rapporteur was not in a position to verify these figures. Since 2011, the Government has also been facing protests in the key strategic Eastern Province, which is home for the country’s main oil production and where the majority of Saudi Arabia’s Shi’a population lives. Inspired by the Arab Spring, and facing ongoing repression, the Shi’a minority has started calling for reform.

III. Elements of the legal Framework

A. International Framework

7. Saudi Arabia is a party to some of the main international human rights conventions, including the Convention against Torture, the International Convention on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination and the Convention on the Rights of the Child, as well as some optional protocols. It is not party to either the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights or to the Covenant on Economic Social and Cultural Rights. It is bound, however, by the relevant rules of international human rights law, which include the absolute prohibition of torture, the prohibition of the arbitrary deprivation of the right to life and of the prohibition of arbitrary deprivation of liberty, the fundamental principles of fair trial and due process, including the presumption of innocence and the principle of non-discrimination. These rights form part of customary international law. They are proclaimed in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR) and are norms of jus cogens (peremptory norms of international law) from which no derogations are permissible.

1 See A/HRC/WG.6/17/SAU/2.

B. National framework

9. Saudi Arabia is an Islamic state. It is a theocracy, whereby all source of authority derives from God. Its judicial system is based on Islamic law (Shari’ah) for both criminal and civil cases. At the top of the legal system is the King, who acts as the final court of appeal and as a source of pardon. The court system consists of three divisions. The Shari’ah Courts hear most cases, in three jurisdictions: The Court of First Instance, the Court of Cassation, and the Supreme Judicial Council. In addition to the regular Shari’ah courts, the Board of Grievances hears cases that involve government. The court system is supplemented by various quasi-judicial committees within government ministries that address specific disputes, such as labour issues. In April 2005, a reorganisation of the judicial system began, which was approved by Royal Order on October 1, 2007. Changes included the establishment of a new Supreme Court and special commercial, labour and administrative courts.

10. The Basic Law of Governance provides that “the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia is a sovereign Arab Islamic State with Islam as its religion; God’s Book and the Sunnah of his prophet, God’s prayers and peace be upon him, are its constitution”. Accordingly, the Shari’ah provides the basis of governance and characterizes the State as well as its relationship with its citizens. While the Kingdom has ratified several core human rights treaties, is a current member of the United Nations Human Rights Council (HRC), and has a substantial Human Rights Department within the Ministry of Islamic Affairs, it often puts forward the Shari’ah, or divine law, its culture and the Islamic character of the State as impediments to full implementation of international human rights standards.

11. Government sources placed emphasis on Saudi Arabia’s commitment to international co-operation and mutual legal assistance in countering terrorism, and its efforts to stem the flow of terrorist financing. The extent to which such legislation is effectively implemented is open to question. The Special Rapporteur commends the efforts of the Government to alleviate the suffering of the victims of terrorism through comprehensive programs involving financial, psychological, educational, career opportunities and moral support. Financial, housing and psycho-social support for the victims of terrorism and their families is an essential part of an integrated counter-terrorism strategy.

12. Saudi Arabia’s first counter-terrorism legislation, the Law of Terrorism Crimes and its Financing, was approved by the King in December 2013 and entered into force on 1 February 2014. Interior Ministry Regulations issued on 7 March 2014 extended the counter-terrorism law’s definition of terrorism by adding to the list of acts classed as terrorism. On 31 October 2017, the Saudi Council of Ministers adopted a further Law on Combating Crimes of Terrorism and its Financing, which replaced the 2014 framework. This new law transfers extensive powers from the Interior Ministry (which was reorganised in 2017) to the newly established Public Prosecution and Presidency of the State Security\(^7\), both of which report directly to the King.

13. The Specialized Criminal Court (SCC) was created in the General Court in Riyadh, in 2008, to prosecute individuals accused of terrorism. Many had been held in detention for alleged involvement in Al-Qaeda attacks in the Kingdom, which began in 2003. By July 2007, about 9,000 suspects had been detained, according to official figures. Many went through the “de-radicalisation” programme established in 2004.\(^8\)

IV. Key human rights concerns

A. Definition of terrorism under the counter-terrorism legislation

14. The 2014 Law had a very broad definition of terrorist crimes, which encompassed any act “directly or indirectly intended to disturb the public order of the state, or to destabilise the security of society, or the stability of the state, or to expose its national unity to danger, or to suspend the basic law of governance or some of its articles, or to insult the reputation of the state or its standing, or to inflict damage upon one of its public utilities or its natural resources.”\(^9\) Anyone, whether Saudi Arabian or a foreign national, whether inside the country or abroad, who was accused of such conduct could be prosecuted as a “terrorist” inside Saudi Arabia. This included those who attempted to “change the ruling system in the Kingdom” or “harmed the interests, economy, and national and social security of the Kingdom”.\(^10\) Under such a broad definition, anyone challenging the authority or policies of the state could qualify as a terrorist.

15. The Interior Ministry Regulations, issued on 7 March 2014, extended the counter-terrorism law’s already overly broad definition of terrorism to include such acts as “calling for atheist thought in any form, or calling into question the fundamentals of the Islamic religion on which this country is based.”\(^11\) The definition also included anyone who had “contact or correspondence with any groups, currents [of thought], or individuals hostile to the Kingdom;”\(^12\); anyone “seeking to shake the social fabric or national cohesion, or calling, participating, promoting, or inciting sit-ins, protests, meetings, or group statements in any form”; and anyone “who harms the unity or stability of the Kingdom by any means.”\(^13\) The Ministry’s guidance states that terrorism would be committed by anyone “attending conferences, seminars, or meetings inside or outside [the Kingdom] targeting the security of society, or sowing discord in society”,\(^14\); as well as those “inciting or making countries, committees, or international organizations antagonistic to the Kingdom.”\(^15\)

16. The United Nations Committee against Torture (CAT) has expressed concern that this law would criminalize any peaceful expression of opinion or belief deemed to endangering “national unity” or undermining “the reputation or position of the State”\(^16\). The United Nations Working Group on Arbitrary Detention (WGAD) has referred to the “grave and

---

\(^7\) The Presidency of the State Security was established by royal decree in July 2017 to coordinate all Saudi security institutions, including counterterrorism and domestic intelligence services, placing them under the direct authority of the King (who also acts as Prime Minister) and sidestepping the Ministry of Interior. Saudi Gazette, “Saudi Arabia creates new security authority”, 20 July 2017, http://saudigazette.com.sa/article/513421/SAUDI-ARABIA/King-Salman.

\(^9\) Article 1.

\(^10\) Article 3.

\(^11\) Article 1.

\(^12\) Article 6.

\(^13\) Article 8.

\(^14\) Article 9.

\(^15\) Article 11

\(^16\) CAT/C/SAU/CO/2, para. 16.
systematic violations of the norms related to the right to a fair trial, including the obligation of the Government to define criminal offences precisely within the law.”

17. The Special Rapporteur concurs with this assessment, and considers that the definition of terrorism in the 2014 Law on Counter Terrorism and its Financing is objectionably broad and fails to comply with international human rights standards. The concept of terrorism should be confined to acts or threats of violence committed for political, ideological, religious or other motives, aimed at spreading fear among the population, or sections of it, in order to coerce a government or international organization to take or refrain from taking any action. Contrary to basic international human rights standards, articles 1 and 3 of the 2014 Law criminalise a wide spectrum of acts of peaceful expression, opinion, assembly and association, as well as freedom of thought and religion. This has a seriously restrictive impact on civil society as almost any non-governmental political action can be criminalised as an act of terrorism. This law can also be used to request extraditions of peaceful political opponents and human rights defenders who have sought refuge abroad.

18. The 31 October 2017 Law introduced a new Article 30 which extends the definition of terrorism to those who “describe” the King or Crown Prince “in any way offensive to religion or justice”.

19. As the definition of terrorism can include peaceful advocacy for political or policy reform, or criticism of the King, the expression of peaceful dissent can be prosecuted as terrorism under this provision. Intellectual and academic freedom is also ruthlessly suppressed. The “misuse” of “academic or social status or media influence” is listed as aggravating factor for the purposes of sentencing and attracts a minimum of 15 years of imprisonment for the most trivial of infractions. Article 44 embodies a direct attack on freedom of expression. It provides that “anyone who broadcasts or publishes by any means news, statements, false or malicious propaganda, or the like, for the purpose of carrying out a terrorist offense shall be punished by imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years and not less than one year”.

20. At the end of his country visit, the Special Rapporteur’s recommended that the Government must “urgently to review the definition of terrorism in the 2014 Law and bring it into line with international human rights norms, and to refrain from using anti-terrorism and other forms of national security legislation to stifle peaceful political dissidence, criticism or non-violent protest”. Far from bringing the definition into line with international standards, Saudi Arabia has enlarged the operation of the law to implement an even more repressive crackdown on the exerciser of internationally protected civil and political rights. Saudi Arabia has similarly ignored the recommendation of the United Nations Committee Against Torture (CAT) to “consider revising the definition of terrorism in the Penal Law for Crimes of Terrorism and its Financing so that its criminalization provisions are as narrow as possible and cannot serve as a basis for prosecuting individuals engaged in non-violent expression and advocacy, especially in defence of human rights”.

B. Use of the counter-terrorism and state security related legislation to stifle dissent

21. Having received numerous reports about persecution of dissidents based on the 2014 Law, the Special Rapporteur notes with grave concern that the first individual convicted under the 2014 Law before SCC was Waleed bin Sami Abu al-Khair, a human rights lawyer and the head of an independent human rights organization founded in 2008 (Monitor of Human Rights in Saudi Arabia).

22. Many prominent human rights defenders, religious figures, writers, journalists, academics and civic activists, were the subjects of communications from the OHCHR’s special procedures mandate holders. These included the eleven founders of the Saudi Civil and Political Rights Association (ACPRA). In its responses, the Government stated that those persons were arrested and detained for offenses related to terrorism and state security. The Government’s classification of their alleged “offences” are indicative of the types of activity that are prosecuted as terrorism in Saudi Arabia. They included the “crimes” of misleading public opinion and tarnishing the country’s reputation; defaming the loyalty and faith of the members of the Council of Senior Scholars; disparaging and insulting the judiciary; contesting the independence of the judiciary; disrespecting the legal profession; and disseminating statements and booklets containing false, uncorroborated and unauthenticated information with a view to damaging the reputation of the Kingdom. These offences are laid down in the national legislation, including, the Basic Law of Governance, the 2014 Law, and the Civil Society Associations and Foundations Act (Royal Decree No. M/8 (1 December 2015). In its responses, the Government insisted that these prosecutions are compatible with international norms and standards, in particular with articles 19, 20 and 29(2) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR). The Special Rapporteur cannot agree with this conclusion.

23. The Special Rapporteur underscores that, according to the UDHR’s article 29(2), no restrictions may be placed on the exercise of the rights and freedoms laid down in the Declaration other than those that are determined by law, and that are objectively necessary to guarantee the respect for the rights and freedoms of others and to meet just requirements of morality, public order and the general welfare in a pluralistic and democratic society. States have a positive obligation to foster and ensure the existence of an enabling environment for citizens to exercise peacefully their rights to freedom of expression, assembly and association. Those with beliefs that are unpopular with the State nonetheless have the right to communicate information and opinions, and to participate, and contribute to the building of a just society, freely and without fear (A/HRC/20/27, paragraph 63).

24. Despite repeated requests by the Special Rapporteur, the Government did not give access to any of the individuals currently in detention for offences related to the exercise of free speech rights. He provided the relevant authorities with a list of names of those he wished to interview confidentially. These included a number of individuals whose cases had been reviewed by the United Nations Working Group on Arbitrary Detention (WGAD) in 2015, which found their detentions to be in breach of international human rights law. They were Suleiman bin Ibrahim al-Rashudi, Abdullah bin Hamid al-Hamid, Mohammed bin Fahd al-Qahtani, Abdulkareem bin Yousef al-Khoder, Mohammed bin Saleh al-Bajadi, Omar bin Mohammed al-Said, Fadhel Maki al-Manasif and Raef Badawi. In each case, the WGAD found their deprivation of liberty to be “arbitrary” because it was based on the peaceful exercise of free speech and peaceful association. The Special Rapporteur is profoundly concerned that this decision remains unimplemented over two years later and reiterates the demand of the international community that the Government must release the individuals named in the decision.

25. The Special Rapporteur is further concerned at the pattern of systematic repression in the country’s Eastern Province, where the majority Shi’a population resides. The Special Rapporteur has received credible allegations that many individuals protesting against repression of the Shi’a have been detained. Their cases are currently making their way through the Specialized Criminal Court (SCC). Many of these individuals were reportedly peaceful protesters, simply asking for increased religious freedoms, equal rights for the Shi’a community and political reform. Some have been convicted for the expression of their political views; some for coordinating protests through social media; and some even for providing first aid to protesters. In this process, a number of individuals who were under the age of criminal responsibility at the time they committed the alleged offences have now been sentenced to death. Others have already been executed. 22

26. In one case, a man of Sunni obedience was convicted by the SCC for having published an article criticizing prejudices by Sunni religious scholars towards members of the Shi’a branch of Islam and their beliefs. He was sentenced by the SCC on 17 June 2013 on charges that included sowing discord, harming public order and the image of the state, questioning the integrity of state officials and defaming religious leaders. The Court banned him from writing in the press and on social media networks, and from appearing on television or radio. The appeal division of the SCC upheld the sentence in June 2014. 23

27. The Special Rapporteur notes that these arrests, detentions and convictions not only reveal serious flaws in the Saudi counter-terrorism acquis, but also send a message to citizens and human rights defenders that they will be prosecuted if they engage in these broadly defined activities.

28. The Special Rapporteur strongly condemns use of counter-terrorism legislation with penal sanctions against individuals peacefully exercising their rights to freedom of expression, as well as freedom of religion or belief and freedom of peaceful association and assembly. 24 As a matter of international law, the imperative of effective counter-terrorism cannot lawfully be misused as an excuse to quash public advocacy by peaceful critics, human rights activists and members of minority groups. Yet this is routine in Saudi Arabia today.

29. The Special Rapporteur reiterates his recommendation, first made to the Government at the conclusion of the country visit, that it must urgently establish an Independent National Security and Due Process Review Mechanism to re-examine all cases in which individuals are currently serving sentences of imprisonment based on acts which constitute the exercise of free speech, freedom of thought, conscience, religion or opinion, or the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and association. The Mechanism should have power to commute or pardon all such prisoners with immediate effect.

C. Unfair trials before the Specialized Criminal Court

30. Public information about cases before the SCC is scarce. The Court was established in October 2008 to try detainees held in connection with terrorism offences. At that time, files relating to 991 detainees had been prepared and they were to stand trial on capital charges. In 2009, the Ministry of Interior disclosed that the trials had begun. Most cases dealt with by the SCC are shrouded in secrecy. 25 Yet the Court appears to be very active: according to figures made available to the Special Rapporteur, by January 2016 the court had tried 2,225 cases involving 6,122 defendants. The Special Rapporteur was reliably informed that the Court initially focussed on allegations of political violence linked to Al-Qaeda. However, this began to change in 2010 and for the past 8 years the Court has been used increasingly for the prosecution of human right and political activists. Far from a gradual modernisation and improvement of the human rights situation that the Government is keen to portray internationally, the true picture seems to be that Saudi Arabia is backsliding into ever more severe political repression.

31. The secrecy of these trials raises serious concerns about their fairness. The Special Rapporteur received many reports about due process violations including the lack of effective

---

23 See (SAU11/2015)

24 In its resolutions, HRC noted its grave concern that “in some instances, national security and counter-terrorism legislation and other measures, such as laws regulating civil society organizations, have been misused to target human rights defenders or have hindered their work and endangered their safety in a manner contrary to international law” (A/HRC/RES/25/18, A/HRC/RES/27/31, A/HRC/RES/32/31 and A/HRC/RES/34/5).

habeas corpus guarantee; trials proceeding in secret; trials going ahead in the absence of defence lawyers; and trials in absentia with no effective defence. The Special Rapporteur received broadly consistent reports concerning the use of torture and the ill-treatment of detainees; arbitrary arrests and detention; violation of the right to independent legal counsel in detention (a key protection against abuse); the absence of genuinely independent medical examinations of suspects alleging torture; the practice of holding suspects incommunicado or in secret detention; the admission of evidence obtained under torture in breach of Saudi Arabia’s obligations under article 15 of the Convention against Torture; and executions following manifestly unfair trials. The President of the SCC assured the Special Rapporteur that all the rights guaranteed to an accused person are protected. The Special Rapporteur does not accept this to be the case.

1. Use of torture, coerced confessions and lack of accountability

32. During his visit, the Special Rapporteur was informed by the Government that there are legal safeguards in place to prevent torture under the 2013 Code of Criminal Procedure (CCP). The Government categorically denies that torture is ever committed on any detainee, and assured the Special Rapporteur that all detainees are afforded all their legal rights all of the time. That would a surprising assertion for any State to make, but all the more so in the case of Saudi Arabia.

33. All prisons and places of detention in Saudi Arabia are under the supervision of the Bureau of Investigation and Public Prosecution (Department of the Attorney General). This institution is empowered to undertake inspections to monitor the condition of detention of detainees and to ensure that the appropriate regulations are being applied. The Prosecutor’s Office is charged with investigating allegations of torture. In accordance with paragraph 5 of the Medical Services Regulations, promulgated by Ministerial Decision No. 4093 (25 September 1978), all persons should undergo a medical examination at the time of their admission to the prison, followed by periodic medical check-ups.

34. In addition, the Government pointed to the existence of prison and police monitoring mechanisms within the Human Rights Commission and National Society of Human Rights. The representatives of both organisations informed the Special Rapporteur that they carry out unannounced visits to prisons and places of detention and evaluate complaints of ill-treatment. Both organisations have offices located within certain prisons.

35. However, the Special Rapporteur received well-documented reports of the use of torture and ill-treatment by law enforcement officials against individuals accused of having committed acts of terrorism, and the use of coerced confessions as sole or decisive evidence in their conviction. In a report published in June 2016, the CAT expressed its deep concern at the numerous reports brought to its attention that torture and other ill-treatment are commonly practiced in prisons and detention centres in Saudi Arabia, in particular in branches of the Criminal Investigation Department of the Ministry of the Interior and in Al-Mabahith detention centres. The methods used allegedly include electric shocks, sleep deprivation, incommunicado and prolonged solitary detention, and beatings to the head, face, jaw and feet. He recalls that the particular severity of the crime of torture is reflected in the

---

26 See (SAU5/2016)
27 Ibid, see also A/HRC/WGAD/2015/38 and; Lori Plotkin Boghardt, “From ISIS to Activists, New Security Trials in Saudi Arabia”, the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, No. 33, 05/2016; Oliver Windridge, “Fatally Flawed: An Analysis of the Judgment Against a Youth Protester Sentenced to Death by Saudi Arabia’s Specialized Criminal Court”.
28 Article 2 of the Code of Criminal Procedure forbids causing bodily or moral harm to a person under arrest or subjecting him to torture or degrading treatment. Royal Decree no. 43 (16/06/1958) provides for a sentence of up to ten years imprisonment for an official who is proven to have engaged in abuse or coercion, such as torture or cruel treatment, while in office; this includes imposition of exemplary punishment. It further stipulates that anyone who has suffered harm shall have the right to appropriate compensation. CAT/C/SAU/Q/2/Add.2 para. 2.
special position its prohibition takes in international law, as both a peremptory norm of customary international law, (jus cogens) and one of the few absolute and non-derogable human rights.

36. The CAT noted its concern that in Saudi Arabia “coerced confessions are admissible evidence in the courts” in breach of Article 5 of the Torture Convention. It condemned “the absence of specific provisions to invalidate confessions obtained in violation of the Convention, including the reported failure to investigate allegations of coerced confessions.” The Special Rapporteur recalls that the admissibility of coerced confessions in court provides an incentive to the use of torture. Article 15 removes this incentive and helps ensure the fairness of criminal proceedings and the reliability of verdicts.

37. The Special Rapporteur notes that allegations of torture or other forms of ill-treatment do not appear to be taken seriously by trial judges. Of particular concern, the Special Rapporteur was informed that the SCC has refused to launch investigations into allegations of torture. In one case, the Court recorded the allegations of torture in its judgement, but declined a defence request to order an investigation or to produce the video tape of the accused’s interrogation. Between 2009 and 2015 more than three thousand allegations of torture were formally recorded. Despite this, the Special Rapporteur is not aware of a single official prosecuted for committing an act of torture or other ill-treatment. The theoretical protections enshrined in law appear illusory in practice.

38. The Special Rapporteur recalls that victims of torture and other ill-treatment must have a right to lodge a complaint of ill-treatment in custody. The threshold for an admissible complaint must not deprive the procedure of its effectiveness. Any allegation must be promptly followed by an impartial examination by body which is independent of the alleged perpetrator. Whenever there are reasonable grounds to believe that an act of torture or ill-treatment has been committed, article 12 CAT imposes an investigative obligation on the State.

39. Torture can be difficult to prove. The Special Rapporteur notes that Saudi counter-terrorism legislations allow for incommunicado detention for extended periods. The General Assembly noted in resolution 70/146 that “prolonged incommunicado detention or detention in secret places can facilitate the perpetration of torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment and can in itself constitute a form of such treatment.” The CAT has frequently confirmed that incommunicado detention “effectively deprives [detainees] of legal safeguards against torture”.

30. “[J]udges of the Court have repeatedly refused to act on claims made by defendants facing terrorism charges that they were subjected to torture or ill-treatment during interrogations for the purpose of compelling a confession.” CAT/C/SAU/Q/2, para. 17.

31. See Oliver Windridge, “Fatally Flawed: An Analysis of the Judgment against a Youth Protester Sentenced to Death by Saudi Arabia’s Specialized Criminal Court”, on file with the Office of the Special Rapporteur, para. 35.

32. See articles 13 and 16 CAT, and SR torture A/HRC/13/39/Add.5

35. See Article 6 of the 2014 law, and articles 20 and 21 of the 2017 legislation.

37. Para. 16.
40. The Special Rapporteur has received testimonies of individuals who never saw a lawyer during the entire duration of their investigation. Others met their lawyers very late in the process. Early access to a lawyer is critical to achieving basic levels of transparency. The practice in Saudi Arabia leaves detainees completely at the mercy of the detaining authority. At the end of his country visit the Special Rapporteur called upon the Government introduce immediate reform to guarantee the presence of lawyers automatically after a suspect’s detention and to abolish the existing practice whereby access to legal representation required the permission of the Bureau of Investigation and Public Prosecution. Once again, Saudi Arabia has not only ignored the Special Rapporteur’s recommendation but has introduced new provisions in flagrant defiance of it. The 2017 Counter-Terrorism legislation, introduced following the country inspection, provides that the Public Prosecutor now enjoys an unconstrained discretion to forbid lawyers from communicating with their clients at any time during the investigation.

41. Saudi Arabia’s failure to provide minimum procedural safeguards during detention and interrogation, and its judicial practice of admitting coerced confessions into evidence, strongly suggests that the practice is officially endorsed. The situation in Saudi Arabia amounts to a systematic and flagrant denial of justice in this regard. International human rights obligations prohibit any State from extraditing suspects to face trial in Saudi Arabia in the absence of independently verifiable and solid guarantees against ill-treatment, and an enforceable undertaking not to use arguably coerced confessions in evidence. To meet international standards, such guarantees must be backed by effective independent monitoring.

2. Lengthy pre-trial detentions and flawed investigations

42. Individuals charged with terrorist offences in Saudi Arabia are subjected to exceptionally lengthy periods of pre-trial detention. Under the 2014 Counter-Terrorism Act, individuals could be detained by order of the SCC without limit of time. Under the 2017 Act, the Public Prosecution must now issue an arrest warrant within seven days of a suspect’s arrest, a period which is seriously in excess of widely accepted international standards. The warrant need not provide specifics of the charge.

43. The new counter-terrorism legislation confers on the Presidency of the State Security the authority to conduct “search, investigation, seizure, criminal and administrative prosecution” without judicial oversight. This was established by Royal Decree in July 2017 purportedly in order to coordinate security institutions. The exercise of these powers is now under the direct authority of the King, thus sidestepping the Ministry of Interior. This reflects the increasing centralization of power in Saudi Arabia.

---

39 SR torture, A/HRC/13/39/Add.5.
40 See article 10 2014 Law.
41 Article 21.
42 See CAT Committee, Communication no. 514/2012, CAT/C/53/D/514/2012. See also the African Commission, “once a victim raises doubt as to whether particular evidence has been procured by torture or ill-treatment, the evidence in question should not be admissible, unless the State is able to show that there is no risk of torture or ill-treatment. Moreover, where a confession is obtained in the absence of certain procedural guarantees against such abuse, for example during incommunicado detention, it should not be admitted as evidence.” Egyptian Initiative for Personal Rights and Interights c. Egypt, Communication 3342006, par. 185, I March 2011]
43 The CAT showed its concern, in 2016, “that the State party’s laws allow detained persons to be held without charge for up to six months and they do not require the authorities to promptly present persons deprived of their liberty to a judge who has the power to order their release nor do they guarantee the right of persons deprived of their liberty to have prompt access to independent medical assistance”.
44 Articles 5 and 19.
45 Article 4 2017 CT legislation
44. Individuals are legally compelled to provide information for counter-terrorism investigations. This overrides essential privacy protections such as legal professional privilege and journalistic privilege.

45. Article 15 of the new legislation provides broad powers for State authorities to use physical force on undefined grounds. On its face, it permits the use of force against individuals participating in peaceful gatherings. The use of force in such circumstances offends against the UN Basic Principles on the Use of Force by Law Enforcement Officials.

46. Article 27 authorizes SCC to hear secret witnesses and expert testimonies without providing the defence with any opportunity to cross-examine in person or through counsel. This impairs the fundamental rights of defence, and can only be consistent with the right to a fair trial if counterbalanced by effective safeguards. That is not the case in Saudi Arabia.

3. Lack of independence

47. The CAT had already found in 2016 that the SCC was insufficiently independent of the Ministry of the Interior.\(^{47}\) While the new legislation strips away much of the investigatory powers from the Ministry of the Interior and places them directly under the authority of the Public Prosecution and the Presidency of the State Security, both of which report directly to the King. Again, this is consistent with the increasing centralisation of power in the Monarchy and reflects a lack of confidence in independent civil institutions. Concerns regarding the lack of independence of the SCC therefore remain undiminished.

4. Use of the death penalty following manifestly unfair trials

48. The Special Rapporteur expresses his grave concern about the lack of due process in terrorism cases generally. This concern is particularly acute in cases involving the imposition of the death penalty. In 2015, more than 158 people were reportedly executed, the highest number of executions recorded in Saudi Arabia since 1995.\(^{48}\) In 2016, there were 154 executions. The mass execution of 47 individuals on one day (2 January 2016) provoked an international outcry\(^{49}\). These individuals were killed by public beheading and firing squad, following judicial proceedings that did not meet minimum international standards of due process. Among them were a number of people with psycho-social disabilities, and individuals who were under the age of 18 at the time the crime was committed. Some had been convicted of political offences not involving the use of violence.\(^{50}\) Especially provocative was the execution of prominent Shi’a cleric, Sheikh Nimr al-Nimr, who had been convicted in connection with political activities.\(^{51}\)

49. On 1 June 2016, 24 individuals were put on trial in relation to the 2011 pro-democracy protests (the “Awamiyah cell”). The SCC convicted and sentenced 14 of them to death. Reportedly, the trial failed to meet due process and fair trial standards, and the defendants were tortured and denied access to lawyers.\(^{52}\) This case represents a significant cause for concern.

50. Since the Special Rapporteur’s visit, several more individuals from the Shi’a minority have been sentence to death and face imminent execution for their involvement in pro-democracy demonstrations in the east of the country in 2011 and 2012. The trials were described as manifestly unfair by civil society groups.\(^{53}\) The Saudi Minister of Justice

\(^{47}\) CAT/C/SAU/CO/2, Para.17.

\(^{48}\) A/71/332, para. 23.

\(^{50}\) See a joint press release issued by several special rapporteurs and CRC on 22 September 2015.

\(^{52}\) See cases no. (SAU 5/2016) and (SAU 7/2017).

reportedly described the trials as “terrorist cases”, which were “held in the presence of their relatives and representatives of the media and the Human Rights Commission.” 54 The Special Rapporteur has considered in detail an independent record of one such prosecution in which there appeared to have been multiple due process violations. 55

51. The Special Rapporteur is further dismayed that the new 2017 Counter-Terrorism legislation provides the death penalty for crimes that do not entail the loss of life.

52. In its resolution 71/187, the General Assembly called upon States to reduce the number of offences punishable by death. The United Nations Secretary-General has noted that the application of the death penalty for overly broad and vaguely defined terrorist offences remains a serious concern. To the same effect, in his statement to the sixth World Congress against the Death Penalty, 56 the High Commissioner for Human Rights stated that some States criminalized the legitimate exercise of fundamental freedoms with overly vague counter-terrorism legislation. As the High Commissioner pointed out, the threat or use of the death penalty in such cases was an egregious violation of human rights. 57 The Special Rapporteur considers that this is apt to describe the institutionalized use of the death penalty in Saudi Arabia.

53. The Special Rapporteur concurs with the United Nations Secretary-General that in the light of the evolution of international human rights law and jurisprudence and State practice, the imposition of the death penalty – particularly in the barbaric and public way in which it is used in Saudi Arabia – is incompatible with fundamental tenets of human rights law.

54. The circumstances surrounding the execution of the death penalty can constitute cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment or even torture. The methods of execution employed in Saudi Arabia include beheadings (by a swordsman) followed by crucifixion – the public display of the body. 58 Stoning to death and execution by firing squad are also commonplace. Sometimes the individual’s hands and legs may be amputated following their execution by beheading, and the families denied access to the deceased’s body. 59 People are executed in this way not only for grave crimes of violence, but for the so-called “crimes” of adultery, apostasy, witchcraft and sorcery. The Special Rapporteur considers that Saudi Arabia’s use of the death penalty is archaic and inhumane and degrading not only to the person who is executed but to all who contribute to it and those who take part as spectators. It demeans and degrades the people of Saudi Arabia as a whole.

55. The Government should urgently review all current cases in which prisoners accused and sentenced for terrorism are facing the death penalty in order to ensure the international minimum standards are met in each case. This means that the sentence of death may be imposed only for the most serious crimes that result in loss of life, and should never be imposed on individuals who were minors at the time the crime was committed or disabled. Only full respect for stringent due process guarantees distinguishes capital punishment as permitted under international law from a summary or arbitrary execution. If, contrary to international standards, Saudi Arabia remains wedded to the cult of execution, it must, as a minimum concession to human dignity, urgently search for more humane methods of killing people that do not glorify public mutilation, humiliation and degradation of all concerned.

55 Oliver Windridge, “Fatally Flawed: An Analysis of the Judgment against a Youth Protester Sentenced to Death by Saudi Arabia’s Specialized Criminal Court”, on file with the Office of the Special Rapporteur.

57 A/71/332, para. 33.

58 See case no. (SAU 2/2016)

59 See case no. (SAU5/2015)
D. Rehabilitation

56. The Special Rapporteur commends efforts of the Government to counter the spread of violent extremism and its associated ideologies not only with security measures but also with concerted action combining social, political and economic assistance and integration. He was particularly impressed by the conditions of detention in two of the five dedicated prisons that he visited, and which hold terrorist suspects and those convicted of terrorism. He visited Al Hair and Dhaiban prisons, examined the facilities and spoke with both staff and inmates at both institutions. The standard of care, and the conditions of detention in these facilities, including medical, vocational training and recreational facilities, appeared above the norm. Generous provision is made for family and conjugal visits, and prisoners are encouraged to remain close to their families. Saudi Arabia can rightly be proud of the rehabilitative nature of the facilities in which it houses certain prisoners accused of terrorism.

57. The Special Rapporteur was impressed with the professional, evidence-based and imaginative rehabilitation and re-integration programmes designed in the Mohammed Bin Naif Counselling and Care Centre. This facility houses prisoners convicted of terrorism who are nearing the end of their sentences and provides them with a range of alternative life skills, from psychotherapy, to professional training and religious instruction, which are designed to offer a counter-narrative to radicalisation. The centre claims an 86% non-recidivism rate - an estimate that the Special Rapporteur was not in a position to verify. Its methodology deserves the attention of other States.

58. At the same time, the Special Rapporteur noted the absence of judicial involvement in placing individuals in these centres. With the 2017 Counter-Terrorism legislation, the responsibility for the centres has been moved from the Ministry of Interior to the Presidency of the State Security. Individuals are to be deprived of their liberty for long periods of time in what can only be described as administrative detention. The Special Rapporteur was informed that several peaceful dissidents have been transferred to such “de-radicalization” centers. The Special Rapporteur recalls that in the absence of authorisation by an independent judiciary, enrolment must be truly voluntary if it is to escape stigmatisation as arbitrary detention.

E. Counter-terrorism operations in Yemen and Syria

59. In 2015, Saudi Arabia took the lead in a newly-formed coalition of eight countries to mount a military operation in Yemen. This operation is aimed at restoring the authority of the duly elected, internationally recognized government of Yemen. The Yemeni Government was deposed in 2015 by opposition forces led by the armed Shi’a Houthi militia. The Special Rapporteur was informed by the Government that it classified the Shi’a Houthi rebels in Yemen as State-sponsored terrorists, allegedly supported by Iran, and that its operations were therefore, at least in part, counter-terrorism operations. Between March 2015, when the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) began reporting on civilian casualties, and 30 August 2017, at least 5,144 civilians have been documented as killed and more than 8,749 injured. Children accounted for 1,184 of those who were killed and 1,592 of those injured. According to OHCHR, coalition airstrikes continued to be the leading cause of civilian casualties in the conflict and of child casualties. Some 3,233 of the civilians killed were reportedly killed by Saudi Arabia-led coalition forces. In addition to markets, residential areas and public and private infrastructure, there were notable

---

60. See article 27 of the 2014 law and. Article 89 of the 2017 law refers to “detainees and convicted” under the law.
62. The coalition was initially made of military forces from Egypt, Morocco, Jordan, Sudan, the United Arab Emirates, Kuwait, Qatar, Bahrain, as well as US-private “Academy” mercenaries. It has received logistical and intelligence support from the US, the UK and France.
63. 5 September 2017, airstrikes in 2017 against funeral gatherings and small civilian boats.64 Shortly after the Special Rapporteur’s visit, on 25 August 2017, an airstrike took place on apartment buildings in the Yemeni capital, which allegedly killed at least 16 civilians and wounded a further 17 people.65

60. The Special Rapporteur recalls that all parties to the conflict in Yemen, including Saudi Arabia, are obliged to respect the applicable rules of international humanitarian law, including the principles of precaution, distinction and proportionality. Civilians and civilian objectives must be protected at all times. Hospitals, schools and religious sites are subject to heightened protections. Parties to the conflict must facilitate rapid and unimpeded passage of humanitarian relief.66 Directly targeting civilians and civilian objects or conducting disproportionate or indiscriminate attacks or a failure to take all necessary precautions to avoid or minimize the impact on civilians constitute serious violations of international humanitarian law, and may amount to war crimes.67

61. The Special Rapporteur was informed by the Government that each airstrike was independently investigated and that the results, where appropriate, were made public. The Special Rapporteur is nonetheless extremely concerned that despite the creation, in August 2016, of the Joint Incident Assessment Team (an investigative mechanism comprised of 14 individuals with military and legal experience from the coalition member States) very little information on civilian casualties has been officially released. In all but one of the cases examined by the JIAT, it found that the coalition was pursuing a legitimate military objective. OHCHR has expressed concern that the JIAT appeared to accept at face value assertions that an intended target was a legitimate military objective justifying attacks that had resulted in civilian casualties and damage or destruction of civilian objects. Despite the frequency and severity of civilian casualties and damage to civilian objects, no concrete action appears to have been taken to hold perpetrators accountable or to provide adequate reparations to the victims.68

62. The Special Rapporteur reminds Saudi Arabia that international human rights law and international humanitarian law impose an obligation to investigate alleged violations effectively to ensure that perpetrators are brought to justice and to provide victims with full and effective reparation. Reparation implies not only that victims must receive adequate compensation, but also that they have the right to truth and to be afforded guarantees against non-repetition. Saudi Arabia is thus subject to an international legal obligation to ensure that a fact-finding investigation, independent of the chain of command involved in the strike, is conducted by the State party to the Coalition in any case in which there are reliable indications that civilians may have been killed or injured, and to make the results public. The Special Rapporteur calls for greater transparency over civilian casualties in Yemen, and calls upon the Government to ensure that such investigations are conducted in every case in a transparent and verifiable manner so that the true extent of civilian casualties can be made public.

63. Since his country visit, the Special Rapporteur has been informed of the devastating effects on the impoverished civilian population of the reported decision by Saudi Arabia, to close air and sea ports in Yemen, setting up a de facto blockade. According to UN estimates, Yemen imports up to 90 per cent of its daily needs. More than 7 million people are being kept alive by humanitarian aid. In a report to the Security Council in January 2018, the situation in Yemen was described as the world’s largest catastrophe with over 22 million people requiring assistance, 8 million people at risk of famine, a cholera epidemic that has exceeded a million cases, and a spreading outbreak of diphtheria. The spokesperson for the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA) has stated that Yemen is on the brink of a man-made famine, and its civilian population is being kept alive thanks to humanitarian operations. He stressed that this “lifeline has to be kept open and it is absolutely essential that the operation of the United Nations Humanitarian Air Service (UNHAS) be allowed to continue unhindered.”.

64. The Special Rapporteur welcomes the 20 December 2017 decision by the coalition to facilitate some access to vital humanitarian assistance and encourages Saudi Arabia to ensure that such assistance is provided without impediments. Depriving civilian population of vital assistance in the context of the armed conflict in Yemen would constitute a grave breach of humanitarian law. The OHCHR already expressed alarm at a series of recent attacks on civilians that have killed dozens of people, including several children. On 1 December 2017, the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights announced the appointment of a Group of Eminent Experts on Yemen, as mandated by the Human Rights Council. The panel will document human rights violations by all parties to the conflict, and will work toward establishing accountability and ending impunity.

65. Turning to the engagement of Saudi Arabia in the Syrian conflict, the Special Rapporteur has received consistent and credible reports that several of the most violent extremist non-state armed groups have benefitted from political, military, financial and logistical support from within Saudi Arabia. Both State and private actors have been implicated in these reports. This runs counter to the Government’s expressed commitment to stem all terrorist financing and its stated policy to combat terrorism both at home and outside its borders. These allegations, corroborated by a variety of credible open data sources, require investigation by the International, Impartial and Independent Mechanism to Assist in the Investigation and Prosecution of Persons Responsible for the Most Serious Crimes under International Law Committed in the Syrian Arab Republic since March 2011. This new mechanism, established pursuant to resolution 71/248 of the UN General Assembly, is responsible for investigating crimes committed by all sides of the conflict.

V. Conclusions and Recommendations

66. There is no doubt that Saudi Arabia has suffered numerous terrorist acts on its territory in the past thirty years. It is also home to large numbers of foreign terrorist fighters returning from the conflicts in Iraq and Syria. The government rightly feels

---

70 According to latest figures, 3,244 Saudi nationals have gone to Syria or Iraq, while 7523 were stopped in Turkey. Richard Barrett, “Beyond the Caliphate: Foreign Fighters and the Threat of Returnees”, the Soufan Group, October 2017.
that it needs to protect its citizens and take meaningful and comprehensive measures to address the threat of terrorism.

67. Experience shows, however, that that disproportionate or discriminatory counter-terrorism measures have a lasting adverse impact. Counter-terrorism measures that violate basic human rights norms have proven to be both ineffective and counter-productive. Measures to counter-terrorism cannot be limited to the use of military force, law enforcement measures and intelligence operations alone. Counter-terrorism measures can only be effective if they respect human rights. It is essential that any measures taken by Saudi Arabia to combat terrorism and violent extremism (however defined) comply with all of the State’s international legal obligations including, in particular, international human rights law, refugee law, and humanitarian law.

68. As a key counter-terrorism partner at the international level, Saudi Arabia must show that it is serious about countering and preventing terrorism and violent extremism that can lead to terrorism. Yet it is clear that the measures that counter-terrorism strategies have been misused for the purpose of stifling political dissent, suppressing opposition and silencing calls for by peaceful critics.

69. Those who peacefully exercise their right to freedom of expression are systematically persecuted in Saudi Arabia. Many languish in prison for years. Others have been executed after blatant miscarriages of justice. A culture of impunity prevails for public officials who are guilty acts of torture and other ill-treatment. Peaceful avenues for redress of grievances are foreclosed by the use of repressive measures to silence civil society. There is an almost complete lack of transparency concerning domestic terrorism prosecutions and a corresponding accountability gap regarding Saudi Arabia’s extra-territorial counter-terrorism operations. Rather than address these issues, which the Special Rapporteur raised with the Government at the end of his country inspection, Saudi Arabia has instead adopted ever more draconian counter-terrorism legislation. These are not the actions of an administration that is confident and secure. Rather, the increasing centralism that is evident in all areas, betokens a level of insecurity about the present administration’s position at home and in the world. Whilst the Government treated the Special Rapporteur with professional courtesy during his visit, officials prevented him from speaking to the prisoners he wished to interview in private, taking him instead to carefully selected showcase facilities. Rather than engaging positively and constructively with the issues, the Government has resorted to blanket denials, bland reassurances and invocations of its own interpretation of the Sharia to justify its actions. If it is to play any effective role in combatting international terrorism, Saudi Arabia must urgently change course.

70. When Saudi Arabia presented its candidature for membership of the Human Rights Council, it pledged to commit itself to the highest standards of human rights protection. The picture that emerges from this report casts doubt upon whether it was wise for Saudi Arabia to be admitted to the Council, and threatens to undermine the authority of the Council itself in the eyes of the world. The Special Rapporteur accordingly calls upon Saudi Arabia to demonstrate, through concrete measures, that it genuinely intends in the future to “uphold the highest standards in the promotion and protection of human rights”, and to comply with the commitments it made in March 2016 when putting itself forwards as a candidate to Human Rights Council.

71. The Special Rapporteur recommends that:

---

71 UN SC res., 2178.
74 General Assembly Resolution A/RES/60/251, paras. 8 and 9.
75 A/71/72.
(a) The Government must urgently review the definition of terrorism in the 2017 Counter-Terrorism Law and bring it into line with international human rights norms. In particular, it must ensure that its provisions are defined with precision and cannot serve as a basis for prosecuting individuals engaged in non-violent expression and political advocacy. Saudi Arabia must refrain from using anti-terrorism and national security legislation to stifle peaceful political dissidents and critics of the acts of the State, the current regime and the Royal Family.

(b) Saudi Arabia should urgently establish an Independent National Security and Due Process Review Mechanism to carry out a thorough independent review of all cases involving crimes allegedly committed by speech or writing. The Mechanism should first seek to identify all individuals that are currently serving sentences of imprisonment for acts which objectively constitute the exercise of their right to free speech, freedom of thought, conscience, religion or opinion, or the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and association. The Mechanism should have power to, and should, commute or pardon all such prisoners with immediate effect. The composition of the Mechanism should include one member of the senior judiciary, together with a majority of independent legal academics, lawyers in independent practice and representatives of civil society.

(c) Saudi Arabia is obliged to investigate, promptly and ex-officio, all allegations of torture and ill-treatment and other serious human rights violations committed under its counter-terrorism and national security framework. It must establish an independent effective and accessible avenue by which victims can lodge complaints about torture and ill-treatment in all places of detention. Genuinely independent investigations must be established whenever there are reasonable grounds to suspect ill-treatment. The Government must ensure that complainants are not subject to reprisals and that victims of torture or ill-treatment receive adequate compensation. As part of this obligation, the relevant authorities are under an obligation to ensure the availability of independent consensual medical examinations at the time of arrest and at regular intervals thereafter.

(d) Given the prevalence of torture allegations in terrorism cases, the Government must ensure that coerced confessions are always inadmissible in law and in practice, except when invoked as evidence against a person accused of torture. Improved judicial training should be introduced to ensure that all judges are made aware of their obligation to take any allegation of torture seriously and to investigate it thoroughly.

(e) Measures should be taken to strengthen the independence of Special Criminal Court and to ensure increased transparency in its proceedings.

(f) All individuals charged under the Counter-Terrorism law must be afforded a genuinely fair trial that respect international guarantees of due process. The 2017 legislation should be amended to provide effective protection for the right to access to counsel, the right to judicial oversight of detention, and the right to limits on the length of pre-trial detention.

(g) Saudi Arabia is legally obliged to implement in full the specific and detailed recommendations of Committee against Torture and the decisions of the Working Group on Arbitrary Detention.

(h) In light of his findings, the Special Rapporteur recommends that Saudi Arabia should extend invitations to the Special Rapporteurs on torture, human rights defenders, freedom of expression and peaceful assemblies to conduct country visits to further investigate the issues identified in this report.

(i) Saudi Arabia should sign and ratify the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and its First Optional Protocol, as well as to the Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture and enable the Subcommittee on the Prevention of Torture to carry out regular unannounced inspections of all places of detention.

(j) The Government should introduce compulsory training programmes for law enforcement officials, investigators, prosecutors, judges and medical personnel on the Manual on the Effective Investigation and Documentation of Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (the “Istanbul Protocol”).

(k) Saudi Arabia should immediately establish a moratorium on the use of the death penalty, with a view to become a party to the Second Optional Protocol of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights aimed at the abolition of the death penalty.

(l) The Government should introduce legislation to ensure that in all cases where a counter-radicalisation rehabilitation programme leads to a deprivation of liberty, it is authorised and supervised by an independent and impartial judicial authority.

(m) In its extra-territorial counter-terrorism operations in Yemen and Syria, Saudi Arabia must ensure that a fact-finding investigation, independent of the chain of command involved in air-strikes, is conducted in any case in which there are reliable indications that civilians may have been killed or injured. The Special Rapporteur calls for greater transparency, and calls upon the Government to ensure that such investigations are conducted in every such case and the true civilian casualties, including the death toll, made public.

(n) The Special Rapporteur calls on Saudi Arabia to pursue its efforts to investigate allegations concerning the provision of material support from sources within Saudi Arabia for violent extremist armed opposition groups in Syria. The Government should fully cooperate with the two UN mechanisms with a mandate to document violations of human rights and humanitarian law by all parties to the conflict in Syria, to redouble efforts effectively to prevent the supply of weapons to armed groups in Syria, and to engage actively in efforts to seek a peaceful political settlement to the conflict.